ONCE UPON A TIME

THE PIRATES OF BANG SARAY . . .

After the fall of the Siamese Kingdom of Ayutthaya in 1767, six ships and their passengers set a course for Thailand's east coast where they hoped to begin a new life. Discovering a long stretch of unspoiled, coconut palm fringed beach, the settlers decided to call their new idyllic destination Sam-Lae. Blessed with ample natural resources, Sam-Lae quickly began to attract the attention of merchants and traders from all over Southeast Asia.

The women folk of the area were known throughout the region for their beauty and were held in high esteem by Chinese merchants visiting Siam. However, the menfolk did not want to lose their beautiful women to foreigners and so set out to scare away unwanted ships looking for a safe harbor. Under the leadership of Jao Kao Tong and Jao Lung Mai, two opium-smoking brothers, Sam-Lae pirates would rob and intimidate any vessels that came too close to their shores.

For more than 20 years, the pirates continued to chase away unwanted visitors until Jao Kao and Jao Lung were lost at sea in a fierce storm. The descendants of the pirates still reside in Bang Saray to this day and have since turned their hands farming, forest husbandry and fishing.

Some 200 years later, the locals of Bang Saray continue to welcome visitors from around the world to their little piece of paradise. However, the town continues to hold a secret from its past: a treasure trove is supposed to be buried in the farm land around Cross Oceanphere Pattaya.
